A few minutes later he inquired whether she would be willing to marry him on $10 per week. She told him that she would, and the following day he told her he would keep his promise and marry her.

After that he became very attentive. On Nov. 22, 1891, he told her that he did not intend to get married. That interview crushed her heart, and she has not had any conversation with him since.

sixth street as soon as they were married.

Upon cross-examination by Lawyer Levy, Miss Murray told the jury that this was her first love. She had never loved anybody else and never could.

After their engagement Stamm always kissed her when he called to see her andshowed the same mark of affection when he left her. Even now she said she loved him and would marry him. She denied having had any similar trouble with any other man. But few letters had passed between them, and in these she addressed him as "Dear Friend William," and concluded with "Yours sincerely." He addressed her also as "Dear friend."

Lucinda Smith, a sister of the plaintiff, was called. She told the jury that she had introduced her sister to Mr. Stamm because he was a great friend of her husband. She told of his visits to the house and his attentions to her sister.

The court then took a recess.
